Institutions, trade and growth: the ancient Greek case of proxenia

— Forthcoming on the Journal of Economic History, Volume 84, Issue 1

Recent scholarship contends that ancient Mediterranean economies grew intensively. An explanation is that Smithian growth was spurred by reductions in transaction costs and increased trade flows. This paper argues that an ancient Greek institution, proxenia, was among the key innovations that allowed such growth in the period 500–0 BCE. Proxenia entailed a Greek city-state declaring a foreigner to be its “public friends,” a status that conferred both duties and privileges. The functions performed by “public friends” could facilitate economic transactions between communities. Accordingly, network and regression analyses establish a strong relationship between proxenia grants and trade intensity.

WORKING PAPERS

‘Returning brains’: tax incentives, migration and scientific productivity

This paper investigates whether common tax schemes aimed at inducing high-skill immigration produce positive productivity effects on the host country. While recent contributions have provided evidence that such policies induce the expected migration effects, little is known about broader benefits in terms of innovation or economic performance. To shed light on this question, this paper focuses on an Italian tax break targeting researchers and uses publication data to measure productivity. First, the data show a strong first-stage in terms of migration and positive selection of beneficiaries. Second, high productivity hires do induce large direct and indirect effects, the latter being largely explained by subsequent positive sorting of native workers. Third, evidence shows at best modest and often insignificant productivity spillovers.
